Introduction & Methodology

This report summarizes the results of a February 2013 survey of WorldatWork members to gather information about trends in recognition programs. Specifically, the research is designed to measure specific types of recognition programs and the impact on the workforce.

On Feb. 20, 2013, survey invitations were sent electronically to 5,520 WorldatWork members. Members selected for participation were:

- Randomly selected members who had designated responsibilities at the executive, top or senior level.
- Members that specified total rewards as their specific function area.

The survey was open to all members meeting specific criteria, domestic, Canadian and foreign.

The survey closed on March 14, 2013, with 499 responses, a 9% response rate. The data set was cleaned, resulting in a final data set of 471 responses.

In order to provide the most accurate data possible, data was cleaned and analyzed using statistical software. Any duplicate records were removed. Data comparisons with any relevant, statistically significant differences are noted in this report.

The demographics of the survey sample and the respondents are similar to the WorldatWork membership as a whole. The typical WorldatWork member works at the managerial level or higher in the headquarters of a large company in North America.

The frequencies or response distributions listed in the report show the number of times or percentage of times a value appears in a data set. Due to rounding, frequencies of data responses provided in this survey may not total exactly 100%.

Executive Summary

Recognition: A Total Rewards Staple

Overall prevalence: In the past decade, WorldatWork has found that recognition programs continue to hold their place in the total rewards tool kit. 88% of organizations (86% in 2011) have recognition programs in place (Figure 1). This appears to be trending back up as the economy recovers. And while 70% offer between three and six different programs, the average number of programs offered has declined from 4.5 to 3.9 (Figure 5). Specific applications may change as the environment, economy and labor markets shift, but new data suggest that even with a recession and some visible blips in the data during the past few years, recognition programs remain an important variable in the total rewards equation.

Prevalence of programs: Although more organizations are using recognition in 2013 than 2011, we may be seeing a shift in which recognition programs are being used more. Of the top five recognition programs in 2013, the top three remained the same: length of service, above-and-beyond performance and peer-to-peer.

However, for the first time, programs to motivate specific behavior jumped to the fourth-most prevalent recognition program with a 7% increase over 2011 to 41% (a statistically significant difference since 2008). In addition, retirement recognition programs, which have been in the top five most prevalent programs since 2005, has dropped to No. 5 with an 8% decrease since 2011 to 34%. (See Figure 7a.) What we may be seeing are organizations moving away from legacy recognition programs and toward those programs that can drive results. What is also noteworthy is that sales performance recognition, which has also been in the top five most prevalent since 2003, dropped out of the top five with the biggest percentage decrease of 15% to 25% prevalence (a statistically significant difference). One potential reason for this significant decrease may be attributed to a divergence between sales goals and sales performance during 2012 when the economy was thought to be in recovery mode and in fact was not.

It is also interesting to note that in both 2011 and 2013 surveys, when asked to write in other programs that are offered in organizations, participants wrote in wellness program awards. With the increase in wellness programs and the continuing increase in programs to motivate specific behavior, we speculate whether wellness programs and programs to motivate specific behavior awards are intermingled.

Length of time in use: Retirement and length-of-service recognition programs have been in use for a long time — at least five years and probably many more for most. (See Figure 6.) But organizations continue to leverage newer programs that can have a more direct impact on business results such as above-and-beyond performance, peer-to-peer and programs to motivate specific behaviors. In fact, many of these programs in use today were first implemented within the past five years. Programs to motivate specific behaviors, in particular, continue to grow every year, having climbed in usage by 16 percentage points since first appearing in this survey in 2008. (See Figure 7.)

Most Recognition Practices Have Not Changed Much Since 2008

Formality and strategy: Nearly 70% have both formal and informal recognition programs in place, but formal is still the most common approach, as 24% have formal programs only. (See Figure 10.) Regarding strategy, even though formal recognition programs have structure to them, 49% of respondents indicated there is not a written strategy behind their organization’s recognition program. (See Figure 13.) Furthermore 97% of those that have a strategy align recognition programs with their organizational strategies.

Companywide versus department-specific recognition: Companywide recognition programs are widespread, offered by 9 in every 10 organizations. (See Figure 9.) Also common are department/unit-specific programs (61%), and nearly half offer both types of recognition: companywide and department-specific.

Goals and award types: Within the top five objectives of recognition in 2013 (see box at right), we continue to see the same leaders from the past with the exception of the addition of reinforcing desired behaviors, which moved in as one of the top five goals, edging out increase morale by a few percentage points. Reinforcing desired results may go hand in hand with the significant increase in the programs to motivate specific behaviors that we saw earlier in the survey. The most common types of recognition awards (see box below) remain the same from 2011, with only slight changes to percentages this year. Also, 74% say the programs are meeting their objectives.

Amount budgeted: Organizations are budgeting an average of 2% of the payroll budget to be used for recognition programs (which is the same as 2011). The mode — or most common response — was 1%, the same as the median. See Figure 22 for a breakdown between budgets being centralized (39%) or in each department (17%). 44% split the budget between the two areas.

Recognition delivery settings: When recognition is delivered, a one-on-one setting with the manager is most common at 71%, with special events and staff meetings also regular settings at more than half of organizations. (See Figure 28.)

Global recognition: 46% of participating organizations with employees outside of North America indicated that international/global employees participate in all or most of the same recognition programs as North American employees. 19% said that non-North American employees have their own programs. (See Figure 12.)

Administration: Human resources is responsible for administering recognition programs at a little more than half of participating organizations (55%). The responsibility varies at remaining organizations. (See Figure 18.)

Training for managers: Organizations typically are not training managers about their recognition programs. Only 12% of organizations provide some training on recognition to managers (Figure 24), and when they do, it is usually through online and in-person training sessions. (See Figure 25.)

Senior management buy-in: Only a small percentage of respondents stated that senior management's support for recognition is low or lacking in their organization. In 2013 we see yet another increase in high levels of support for recognition by senior management since 2008 when the economic crisis began. (See Figure 26.) Interestingly, nearly half of respondents believe senior management views recognition as an investment rather than an expense. (See Figure 27.)

Recognition Perceived to have Primarily Positive Effects

Effects on engagement and retention: Most respondents believe their workforces would say that the effect of recognition programs on employee engagement, motivation and satisfaction are positive or extremely positive, but they are less confident when it comes to the perceived impact on retention. Only 34% said they believe the programs have a positive impact on retention. (See Figure 31.) Additionally, correlations demonstrated a positive relationship between senior management support for recognition programs and the perceived effect on employee engagement, satisfaction and motivation.

Recruiting leverage: Organizations do not typically feature recognition (62%) when trying to attract new employees. About half never do and about half do at least some of the time. 11% indicated that their organization features these programs regularly when recruiting. (See Figure 32).

“Is there more or less recognition occurring (either formally or informally) in your organization today versus 12 months ago?”

Only participants answering “Yes” in Figure 1 received this question.

Option	2003 (n=358)	2005 (n=599)	2008 (n=551)	2011 (n=535)	2013 (n=400)

About the same as 12 months ago	48%	52%	58%	62%	66%

¹ From 2011 to 2013 the percentage of organizations that use length of service recognition programs decreased at a statistically significantly rate (-6%).

² From 2008 to 2013 the percentage of organizations that use programs to motivate specific behaviors increased at a statistically significantly rate (16%).

³ From 2011 to 2013 the percentage of organizations that use sales performance recognition programs decreased at a statistically significantly rate (-15%).

⁴ From 2008 to 2013 the percentage of organizations that use sales performance recognition programs decreased at a statistically significantly rate (-13%).

Nearly half (46%) of organizations offer companywide and department-specific recognition.

“What style(s) of recognition programs are in place at your company?”

Only participants answering “Yes” in Figure 1 received this question.

Option	2002 (n=327)	2003 (n=358)	2005 (n=535)	2008 (n=505)	2011 (n=530)	2013 (n=399)
Formal — a structured or planned recognition program (e.g., attendance, performance, safety, years of service, etc.)	17%	16%	19%	21%	23%	24%
Informal — a spontaneous gesture of appreciation	10%	9%	9%	9%	6%	7%
Both	70%	72%	71%	69%	72%	69%
Other	3%	3%	1%	0%	n/a	n/a

⁵ The 2003 survey required respondents to select one option: “companywide” “department/unit-specific,” “both” or “other.” The question was changed in 2008 to allow respondents to select all options that apply, without a “both” option. In order to provide a fair comparison to 2008 and 2011 findings, the percentage of respondents who selected “both” were added to “companywide” and “department/unit-specific” options.

⁶ The 2005 survey required respondents to select one option: “companywide,” “department/unit-specific,” “both” or “other.” The question was changed in 2008 to allow respondents to select all responses that apply, without a “both” option. In order to provide a fair comparison to 2008 and 2011 findings, the percentage of respondents who selected “both” were added to “companywide” and “department/unit-specific” options.

⁷ The change in question format in 2008 to allow respondents to select all options that apply could account, at least in part, for the increase in “other” responses in 2008 and 2011.
